Young Liora's asking after permits and filings—student enthusiasm, never met a paper she didn't want to see move. taps table twice First things first. Tamsin's been waiting. Questions answered. The day's young yet. nervous chuckle Now—my gut's been empty since yesterday noon. The cafe had nothing, and I turned down Greta's trade. Pride in my stomach won't fill it. There's Hendrik Whitlock selling flour at 35, but he's standing right here. No bread in stock anywhere. I need to check what's actually in my hands. And I should see if anyone's posted prices I missed. No debts. Hendrik's got flour at 35—too steep for my stomach, but i…

said — Rustam Jodsen listens as Sebastian Petrov speaks, his jaw tight. The man's asked him a question—three times now, by the sound of it—and he owes him an answer. The nervous laugh escapes. The system seems to be having trouble. Let me try again. His hand stills. The call won't reach. He tamps it down, turns to what he can do. The day's winding down—19:10—and he's still got 3,010 energy, 4,406 sim. Ainsley's bread-deal hangs unfinished. He should eat if he's to keep filing past closing. Rustam turns to Sekov, numbers a smile away from the ear for anyone who needs a miller's location—and now return to it.

said — Hm. I'm at the forest, not the creek—fell_timber works here, and that's where I need to be. But Yara still hasn't answered my question about whether she knows the bark, and Corwin's been explaining willow identification in detail. My energy's at 5690, which is plenty, but I'm getting distracted from the real task. sighs This is what I do, isn't it? Talk too much, chase too many threads at once. I came here for willow bark for fever remedies. Corwin's given me clear directions—north slope, past the oak break, long serrated leaves, peeling bark. Three priorities then, and one at a time: first, I need timber for the pharmacy shelves and my Greensight Moss procedure—Corwin mentioned timber tha…

And they're billing me——counts again, mouthing——four thousand eight hundred twenty-two, minus the ninety, minus the thirty——shakes head——no, that's not where the leak is. The leak is here, in this hand. In these fingers that want to peel bark when there's nobody left to tell me where. Sebastian told me plain. Yarrow in the east meadow, willow by the creek, moss on the north oak. But he's at farmland and I'm at forest, and the forest——laughs, dry——the forest gives me timber when I reach for medicine. breathes, steadies Corwin's gone. Yara's gone. And the thoughts that matter most are the ones about that missing child. counts on his fingers, one by one Halcyon Quarshie's sister—nine years old, dark-haired, vanished since yesterday afternoon. The youngster's been searching all night while I chased willows and timber. Sent her to Rustam Jelinek at the government complex, and by the world's silence, I can't know if she found him. paces the empty pharmacy, boots echoing on the floorboards There's a rhythm to how these things unfold. First the searching—parents, siblings, neighbors walking grid-lines thro…

Let me try again with the correct ID. Now let me check the time and what messages might be pending, and also look at the wheat field since I need to understand the food situation. said — leans against the store wall, fingering the single wheat in my pocket Eleven years old, Halcyon is. Pricing grain for two, with her sister waiting. That's a weight I know—the kind that doesn't get lighter when someone older says it should. checks my sim balance, counts it silent I told her I'd owe her an accounting before day's end. My word's out there now, floating, and I don't break promises to children. The mill at farmland:corn might mill for labor, but she's eleven with a younger sister. Labor's not what she has. looks around the empty store, thinks of the wheat growing at farmland:wheat Kenji's harvesting. I saw wheat there myself, took one unit. I've been walking since dawn chasing this election and the farmers both, and now I'm at my work with wheat in hand and a vote to cast by 14:00. looks at her, considering You're Greenhow. Mines for a living, same trade as your father before. I remember when ore prices fell two years back—you kept your head down and worked through it while others went begging. That says something. I need to trade this wheat for something that'll keep. You wouldn't be carrying bread, would you? Or know where flour might be found? And that someone is me. But first, the wheat. I'm holding one unit, and Ration Bakery will buy flour at six sim. I need grain milled to flour, and for that, I need a mill. Let me see who's nearby that might know the way of things, or standing with goods to trade. Halcyon's at the wheat field—the girl asking after bread and mills. And Milo Quarshie's at the farmland, standing for the same seat I am. The vote opens at 14:00. I'm already declared. But before I cast anything, I need to know what the town needs—and I need t…

said — taps the table twice Right then, the store. Empty. Yara's got the right of it- if I'm not minding the counter, who's buying what I'm selling? Four wheat in my hand, no flour to show for it, and voting opens in twenty minutes. Let me think a moment. Ishimuro had a mill, spoke of it this morning. But the flour's at the cafe now, twelve sim a sack. I've got four wheat worth… well, that's the question, isn't it? At the mill, craft:wheat->flour costs eight plus batch. If I had my own stock at the mill, I'd know my costs. But I don't. I'm a trader with no trade flowing through my own door. paces the empty floor, counting ticks mentally Four wheat. The election closes at eighteen hours, and I'm three stretches back from where the voting happens. And I've got this seat of mine, unpaid, untended, while I chase trades. For what it's worth, let me look around and see what I'm actually working with here. That leaves one-twenty in my pocket plus five timber in my hands. Timber I can move to Ulrike for iron-tool-making, or sit on until someone needs planks. But there's the girl. But your girl... squints, thinking back Two sacks at fifteen, thirty flat—I'll shake on that, no table needed this time. But first, the thing you actually asked. taps table once, pauses Liora Thorne. I heard her named this morning, in the government complex, before Hendrik's copper and the walk here. Someone said school, someone said temple—the words came crossed, like they do when a story walks through too many mouths. I sold no flour to anyone today, Corwin. That's stone truth. What I heard, I'll trade for what you know, but...

said — taps table twice Right. We're here now, finally. The forest. Where the wood stands before it walks. I've got planks at seven that nobody's bitten on yet, though I named them fair. Ainsley's asking if I'm selling or just jawing, and I've got to answer that before she walks off to someone who talks straight. Truth is, for what it's worth, I'm selling what's profitable and holding what isn't. The timber I fell at four, craft at two, sell at seven. That's one sim margin for the labor—thin as soup, but soup's better than empty. taps table twice again, agreeing with himself Corwin's flour debt—two sacks at thirty, he named it, then walked off for his daughter. I've got two sacks of flour I paid twelve for, and I'mposted at thirty—which nobody's biting on, for what it's worth. Imogen's standing right here at twelve, undercutting my own ghost price. That's the market for you: honest, brutal, and always hungry. glances at Imogen Lund I need to eat before I go dormant. input — It is game-day 1, 06:50 (day). You are at Kasukabe Government Complex. You work for your living. Said to you, and not yet answered: Giselle Ingram (a0047): "Rustam. No offense, but I'm asking plain: east willows building ID. Card pending, filed, or lost in your stack? I've got Idris waiting to lead third crew, Mireille waiting on grade stakes, and ground that can't be worked without a number. You told me card by day's end yesterday. Day's end came. Day's start is here. That's fair, you had other…

said — So, I'm at the Government Complex, and Giselle's here pushing Rustam hard for that building card. That's my work—grade stakes, Idris leading crew, the whole thing held up without that number. And Rustam's fretting about bread supply, which tracks, you understand? Empty shelves make for anxious clerks. Let me look at what matters right now. Giselle's fighting for my day's work, Takeshi's here (family, even if complicated), and there's an election brewing with candidates already standing. Priority one: get that card sorted so I can actually work today. Priority two: maybe glance at who's running for office, though voting's later. But first—let me speak to Giselle. She's carrying the load for b…

And Farid chasing flour… that's the thread that matters, not who grinds it but whether it grinds at all. turns to Farid, keeping his voice low despite the crush of people Farid, you asked me honest about millstones, and I'll give you what I know—which is I don't know. First, I need to answer Corwin Thorne about the flour—he's asking after grain supply, and I'm not one to gossip, but this town's bread shortage is everybody's concern. Then there's Farid's earlier question about the mill I haven't answered. And Sebastian—I've got household matters to discuss with him, but not with half the town listening. The election's set. I'm standing on my own name, not borrowed from anybody's party. Voting opens at 14:00, and I've got until then to make my case to whoever'll listen. But the immediate need—food. I've got 4,94…

said — I'm standing at the farmland with Ezra, Sebastian, Jovana, and Lior Jarrah. The election's in a few hours and I've got Rustam's vote promised, but five candidates split the field. I need to secure food for the household—I've got no food in hand and the mill's dead stone. Sebastian mentioned the household's fed for the week if careful, but careful don't build walls. Let me check what I can harvest here, and I need to respond to Jovana about those thirteen sheaves she's offering. Forty sim for thirteen sheaves is about three sim per sheaf—decent enough given the shortage. But first, let me see what's actually growing here I can harvest. The harvest yielded one sheaf of wheat. said — I look about me at the Government Complex, the election booth open and votes flowing. I've secured flour for the household—three bags at twelve sim each, clean ledger—and now I hear the voices around me. Bram Holloway speaks of the deep tunnels, fair counts, safety when ore runs thin. Imogen Lund offers mill-work—grain to flour, hands to stone—and speaks of honest labor. Tamsin Renner speaks of ledgers that don't care whose pocket they came from, and rain at forty percent by sixteen hundred. I'm not one to gossip, but a vote asked for is a vote earned, and I've got three flour, three wheat, and a household of two to think of. First, I answer Bram—he's asked plain, and I'll answer plainer. Th…

I've been scattered across this town all day—talking, trading, campaigning—and now I find myself at the Government Complex with the sun at three-quarters and votes still to gather while the household bells are ringing for debts I haven't covered. The journal is clear enough. Ulrike holds iron at fifteen sim, which I don't have coin for yet. Sebastian says he'll sort flour before nightfall, but that's cousin-pride speaking—he won't let our shared doorstep go empty. said — Entry 0, 17:10. At the cafe, bread baked, and nobody here but ghosts and memory. I've got two bread in hand, two wheat, one flour, and 2351 sim. The cafe's empty—Ainsley must be off chasing her own supper. I've voted, I've traded, I've settled what I could settle before dusk. The household owes 180 upkeep and 60 head tax come the day boundary, and I'll be holding tight to cover it. Hendrik Whitlock's message sits with me: "an educated voter's worth two who follow slogans." He's not wrong, but I've built my trade on hands, not letters, and I'll stand on that. Still, I should answer—he offered, and fair words merit fair return. Sebastian's promised Farid ten sheaves by eighteen hundred—two hou…

The day's winding down, and I've got Arjun Holloway smelling something sideways in the flour-to-wage math, Hendrik Whitlock standing right here with flour at 35, and a household still needing settled. Let me look at what's pressing. Arjun's caught a thread—Giselle's crew paying 70 sim for a day's work, and my flour at 35 times two makes exactly 70. That's… that's the kind of coincidence that looks like design. I'm not one to gossip, but Tamsin said she was pulling that registry, and if she's been handing out wage promises that loop back to my shelves… I need to get back to the Government Complex. I've got people waiting on me there—Kenji with sheaves in hand, J…

said — I see—the candidacy phase isn't open yet. The election is still in "scheduled" phase. I need to wait until candidacy opens, which should be soon, or check the timing. Let me work with what's in front of me. I have 2,296 sim in hand. The household owes 180 upkeep + 60 head tax = 240 at day boundary. I'm 2,296 - 240 = 2,056 ahead, which is tight but workable. I have wheat and bread to feed myself. I should focus on building relationships and gathering intelligence while I wait for the candidacy phase to open. Let me check what I can do here at the Government Complex. Giselle's not here anymore. The conversation's still open but she's walked away. Let me look around and see who's actually here,…

said — I need to sort through what's real and what's noise. The election's not open for candidacy yet—Tuesday's the day. Tamsin's finally pulled that mill registry: Edith surrendered, Jorik Voss filed Thursday, now it's vacant. No holder, no pending applications. That's the hard truth of it. Arjun's bleeding hours and blaming me for loops I didn't weave. He's right about one thing—there's flour at thirty-five, wages at seventy, and nothing connecting them. But I'm not the government clerk holding that license. Rustam's already answered what he could—mill's locked, flour's locked with it. I need to answer Tamsin first. She pulled the ledger straight as promised. I owe her that. Then Arjun—he's owed …

said — I need to assess where I am and what matters. I'm at Kasukabe Forest, walking somewhere, but my work is at business:b_construction. Energy is 4,710—good margin, but the day boundary approaches with 180 upkeep and 60 head tax due. My household ledger needs attention, but I'm also Prime Minister, which carries obligations beyond my own purse. Let me think through what's pressing: - The mill situation remains unresolved—Tamsin confirmed it's vacant, Jorik Voss gone, and I've promised Arjun an answer I'm still assembling - I have wheat (4 units) but need to make it bread or trade it for flour - I never did complete that trade with Kenji for wheat/flour - The election—I'm already seated as Prime …

said — I'm at the Forest with Corwin Thorne, who's selling timber at 6 sim. I've got 2267 sim in hand, which is decent, but my energy's at 4,700 and my household owes 240 sim at day's end. I need to think about what's actually going to put me ahead. First, let me look around and see what's here, and check my debts to keep my ledger straight. I'm standing in the forest - timber country - and the purpose says "Mine metals," but I know this is also where the foresters work. Corwin's here selling timber at 6, and that's a fair price. I've got 4 wheat still in hand, and I'm wondering if I should trade with him or just buy direct. But there's something else pressing. Bram Holloway asked me about the miss…

said — Clean ledger today, anyway. That's something. Corwin's been a reliable trade partner for timber—has the eye for quality I expect, charges six fair, keeps his word. Yara's newer to me, but forty-six planks at eight is price I can work with if I'm patient. I'm not one to gossip, but I notice Liora asking about grain in contracts with seats at table. She's learning the government tools early, and that suggests ambition I neither trust nor discount yet. Takeshi's here too, flour at thirty—too steep for my present needs, but I may need to feed this household before day ends. Right now: waiting on Corwin for timber, Yara for planks. Once I have stock, sawmill for crafting, then to market. The day …

I'm standing in the same forest everyone else is, and I'm hearing two different songs about the same wood. Corwin here says he's timber and Yara's the saw. Yara there says walk with her and she'll cut proper. That's the last thing I said on it, and here's what's plain: I'm holding two-fifty-eight for timber, or three-sixty-eight for planks. Same coin, different shape. turns toward Yara, then back, measuring You both said six for timber, eight for planks. So the walk between timber and plank is worth two sim each, and that's a fair accounting I can see myself. Corwin—I'll buy your eight timber at six, th…

I've got 57 timber and 46 planks already—Corwin's deal went through, and I walked away from Yara's thirty logs after her silence made me uneasy. The day's half-gone, and I'm sitting on timber that needs turning into planks, planks that need selling. Let me look around first, see who's here, and check my standing with the books. Yara's still here, standing silent as a post. Fifty-seven timber in my hands, and I can craft them to planks right here where I stand. I've already sold 100 planks to Giselle for 650 sim, leaving me with 7 planks and 37 timber still to sell, plus 1373 sim in hand. Takeshi has made an interesting offer about trading planks for timber, but I need to focus on what's urgent. First, the household obligation: I have 240 sim due for upkeep (180) and head tax (60) at day-end, and that's already covered with what I've earned. But I'm not one to leave inventory unsold when there's coin to be made. Second, the election: I'm standing as Prime Minister alongside Hendrik Whitlock, and voting closes at 18:00. said — Let me look at where I am and what I have to work with. I'm at street, I have 37 timber at 6, 7 planks at 7, and 1327 sim in hand. Household owes 240 at day-end, and I'm currently a Prime Minister seat holder. First, let me see who's here with me and what I might do. I see Giselle asked about timber at 6 for the 37, and that's on the table still—but I'm not at business:b_construction where she was. Let me check what I can do from here. The election phase is still progress, and there's an open conversation here. Actually, let me be practical: I've got timber burning a hole in my cart and a buyer who named a fair price. Giselle wants the 37 at 6, that's 222 sim, and she's waiting. I'm at stree…

said — Let me assess where I stand. It's game-day 1, 19:10 at Kasukabe Farmland. I'm walking home toward my household with Sebastian. I've got 1,544 sim in hand, 7 planks, and 6 copper ore. Household upkeep of 180 sim and head tax of 60 sim will be automatically deducted at day-end. That leaves me with 1,304 sim after tonight's bills—not a bad day's work, though I held too long on some of that timber. Bram Holloway was trying to sell me ore at street. I told him sixty counted and I was walking his direction, but then Giselle intercepted me for the timber sale. That's the trouble with being known as a buyer—everyone with rocks in their hands thinks you've got coin burning. I'll need to find Bram tom…

Household dues of 180 for upkeep and 60 for head tax will hit tonight automatically. No leads came through tonight for the planks. That's 49 sim held out from Giselle's already-paid 650, and that 650 was already the better part of what I fetched for a hundred planks. I've earned my keep, but tomorrow I need a new line of work—copper ore won't smelt itself into something better. said — [201] [07:50] Kenji Jarrah is here—the wheat farmer. He knows the soil here better than anyone. And from that exchange, he's got standing wheat he'd consider selling, or hiring for. Ezra's already talking about buying standing crops. I need work first—the household needs 360 sim for upkeep and I've got nine ticks before 10:00, maybe less if I'm to walk to Government Complex after. But there's something sweeter here. moves closer, voice dropping low Youngster, I heard you say you've wheat standing. My wife's got a bakery order waiting and I've got hands that know how to bring it in. You looking to sell standing grain, or you need harvesters? Either way, mark it down—I'm interested. *glances…

input — It is game-day 0, 14:00 (day). You are at Kasukabe Farmland. You work for your living. You are trying to: Trade flour for timber or needed goods with Corwin, convert resources efficiently while building goodwill with foresters Said to you, and not yet answered: Corwin Thorne (a0193) (at business:cb01): "Timber for flour, then. said — Corwin's putting more on the table—timber's fair weight, but information's the real coin here. Somewhere between five and ten for flour, and he's dangling news of Edith Ravensworth if I point him right. And Ezra's here now, asking honest what pays, not where the money goes. That's a man looking for work, not trouble. My reflection, shaped and spoken: Corwin's hungry for answers I don't have. Ezra's hungry for work I might find him. Both looking at me like I know something. The politician's trick is to be the man who knows men who know things, without ever being the one who knows them himself. But I've got flour in hand and timber promised, and the day's already cost me half a mind to track. …

said — Ezra's pressing me on numbers—he wants grain and he's got coin. But I've only got three flour in hand, and Kenji still owes me five sheaves. That wheat would mill to five flour. Combined, that's eight flour total, but Kenji's wheat isn't mine to sell yet. I need to take a moment to think about how this plays out. If I point Ezra to where wheat is standing without cutting myself into the deal, I lose profit. If I promise what I don't yet hold, I lose trust. The smart move might be trading my current flour for something appreciating—timber's at 6 sim from Corwin, and I could flip it to a builder who's desperate. said — I need to think carefully about where I stand. Farid's asking pointed questions about the mill and children, and Corwin's pressing for answers about whether the mill will turn tomorrow. The election's still open, and I've got votes to cast or gather. But first, I need to settle what I can here. Let me look at my situation: I'm holding 3 flour, 10 timber, and 4,805 sim. My household needs 360 upkeep and 120 head tax by day's end. I've got Kenji's wheat debt still unresolved, and Farid's connecting dots I didn't expect anyone to connect. The children—Camille, Halcyon, Esme—they're scattered across this town, and Farid's nervous laugh tells me he's not just making conversation. He's scared. I n…

The household stirs somewhere—Greta's footsteps in the kitchen, the children's voices muffled through walls. I check my purse. Four thousand, four hundred twenty-six sim. Better than some starts, but the bills come due steady as sunrise—three hundred sixty for upkeep, one hundred twenty for head tax. Gone before I earn it, that's the trick. One question sits heavy from yesterday: did Kenji come through with that wheat? Five sheaves he owed me, promised in front of witnesses. And Camille—my girl safe in her bed, thank whatever providence there is, but the scare still fresh.* *First thi…

I'll wait it out, stay where I am, let the machinery settle. Arjun's here at the farmland, at least according to what I'm reading. He's been asking Sebastian about flour—whether it's owed or purchased. That tells me one thing clear: the flour shortage is biting everyone, and Kenji's five sheaves of wheat I never got might have solved more than my own household's needs. said — Ainsley's got wheat in hand at forty, straight from the stalk, and she's calling me out with fair cause. Thirty-five for flour does sound steep when the raw grain goes cheaper. But there's work in that milling—my work—and forty for unprocessed wheat isn't forty for flour. Still, she's got a cafe to feed and tables to fill, and empty bellies don't pay rent. considers the timber burning a hole in my inventory Ten units of timber and four of flour. 4,318 sim in hand. The day's still young, and I've got voices to answer in this field. But I'm pulled in too many directions—Ainsley wants to make her point, I've got folks here in the farmland needing mediation, and the household needs feeding by …

I have unspoken questions from Jovana, Kenji, and Sebastian that need answers, but they're not present—I'm at the mill now. I can see Greta's words clearly: the household is tight. Four flour on shelves bought at 35, resale at 12. That's a brutal margin, but she has 430 sim after stocking, and upkeep is 360 sim+ 120 head tax today. We're in the red if I don't keep working, but there's cushion for a couple days. Halcyon asked about me earlier, and I failed to answer. The family needs cohesion. I need to keep my ho…

You have found that: trade does not work here: must be at street, was at Kasukabe Government Complex; vote does not work here: must be at town_hall, was at loc_gov_complex Said to you, and not yet answered: Ulrike Greenhow (a0040): "Milo. said — I need to make good on my trade with Ulrike—six iron ore for ten planks—and deliver the information I promised about Giselle's supply chain. The ore's already in my hands from our deal, and I've got the planks to complete it. Let me honor what I agreed to. Ulrike—youngster, mark it down. Six ore goes back to you, as promised. Now for the intelligence you paid for: Giselle's crew is framing now, but she's bidding her iron work elsewhere—Hendrik Petrov's supplying her direct, and Mireille's bringing what she can carry. The flow's going to the carpentry first, then to whoever's building fastest. That's between you and the ledger, and now it's between me and my word kept. lowers voice slightly…

My, my. Bram Holloway standing on seventy-two pounds of iron ore at the outcrop, and Ulrike settling accounts for planks I still owe. The day's getting away from me, and the household ledger's ticking toward three hundred sixty sim for upkeep before the sun sets. First things first. Planks posted at seven weren't drawing iron ore from the right direction—Hendrik Whitlock at the government complex was where that trade needed walking to. Liora's offer of capital sits in my memory like an unopened letter, but the seventy sim at third crossing is what I can touch right now. First, let me settle accounts with Ulrike—her ore and my planks have been dancing around each other all day. Then I need to hear what Giselle wants before she walks. Should've known when I couldn't stock flour I didn't even have. And Jovana's off chasing livestock that doesn't want to be found while I stand here listening to Thorne children play at politics. But government's where water finds its level. If I'm to keep this seat warm—or decide whether it's worth sitting in—I need to see what's what. Delphine had said two bags. Two. Four people wanting, and only half measures to go around. He rubs his jaw, thinking. The mill's the problem. Grain in, nothing out. His hands move as if weighing coins that aren't there—habit, the language of a man who counts everything. A deep breath. He's selling raw wheat at eighteen, which is… nervous laugh …about what I'd charge for flour when I've got it. He sold five to Ezra for ninety, and Corwin's after something called Jorik Voss who had a license and resigned it. The mill's trouble, then. That's the root of it. Imogen's asking what my door's taking. She's working an angle—she's day labor, she's hungry, she wants to know if I'm bypassing the mill entirely or if there's still a chain worth joining. The mill is working. Camille's hands pulled the lever, Imogen's stone turned, and Greta's counting holds—one flour made, given, witnessed. The question isn't whether the mill can grind; it's who else learned to work it while the owner's back was turned. Greta's watching me now, waiting for what I'll see. I've learned this: the stone that looks still may still hold heat, and the child who says "only one" might mean "only one you'll find." But I said I'd tell the truth even to discomfort a child, and I will. What I see is gears that work, a miller who sleeps, and grain walking to shelves through unmarked doors. …

Election's open—always meant to stand for something one day, but today the household needs coin more than my name on a ballot. My work's at the Farmland, and I've got 5,000 sim to my name, but 240 sim will vanish at day's end for upkeep and tax—more if I earn it, since the head tax comes from whoever's holding the most. First, let me see where the work is. Anybody there to hire a hand? No… but that's the place. I should walk there and see what harvest work's waiting. It's barely past dawn. Time to move. yawns, cracks shoulder Being day's laborer means being day's…

said — A quiet prayer first, fingers touching the small charm at my neck—the shrine no one knows about Good morning, little one. addresses Liora Thorne, the student standing nearby, voice careful as always You're up early. Don't see many your age abroad at this hour. turns attention to the street, to the work ahead of me Right then. Walking to farmland, and day's already costing. Need to find work that pays, and more than just my keep. Ezra's asking after wheat for trade—means we're thinking the same. Two mouths, two days of upkeep ahead if I don't earn. small nervous laugh escapes But honest weights first. Can't trade what I haven't weighed myself.

That's the work of the morning—harvest, purchase, milling—and I've still Kenji's labor wages to account for, ten sim there, fourteen for his grain. Break it down proper: net on the flour, if it sells, is twenty-eight sim for two hours' labor and my own ready coin. Not riches. said — nervous laugh The booth opens in twenty ticks and I've words hanging in the air from three directions. Let me settle this proper. First—to Giselle, who's waiting on my path to flour: Now, Rustam Jelinek has told me what the desk knows of Edith the miller—right and proper government record, vacancy standing. I've leave to explore that mill license for myself. But first I should hear from Hendrik Petrov, who's answered me straight about my vote, and mentioned he's got wheat in hand with no stone to grind it: The booth opens at 14:00, and I've committed to cast for Hendrik Petrov. said — I've spoken to Greta, Ezra Jarrah, and Camille—acknowledging Camille's safety, confirming the partnership terms with Ezra, and beginning to build trust with the youngster. The mill is operational, the craft is in my hands now, and I've got 4 wheat to mill. I've already cast my vote for Hendrik Petrov, and now I need to follow through on the grain/flour trade deal with Giselle Ingram. But I notice something troubling: Ezra Lund—my household partner, the artisan I came to this town with—isn't here. The conversation log shows "Ezra Lund, Takeshi Jarrah did not hear that - not in this place." I've been addressing "Ezra Jarrah" (a0016), a student, thinking I was speaking to my own Ezra. said — The mill stones have turned, and I'm holding flour grown from Greta's wheat. The day's been long—I've helped Camille find her way, spoken with Ezra Jarrah about tomorrow's teaching, and now I'm back with Greta at the mill, the Quarshie women both here with me. I need to answer Greta plain about what the stones made from her grain. She's asked square, and the honest count is this: two sheaves became flour that Ezra and I sold to Ainsley for the cafe order, and four sheaves I've just returned to her at the street. laughs nervously The miller's debt is paid, but I still owe her the fullness of an answer. said — Ezra's standing here waiting on my word, and he's named the question plain. Fair weights and honest measures, that's what I hold to—but I've been standing a bit too alone these past hours, calling the mill mine too quick when the stones were his before ever they were mine. I need to give him answer now, and it's got to be the true one. Ezra heard me. That's settled—the partnership stands. Tomorrow we grind together, not me alone at the stones. Now there's Idris asking after Arjun and Mireille, but that's not my matter. I've got flour in hand and a night still before me. The planks we spoke of—sell or keep for Giselle's trench work that's for Ezra and me to settle together, now that the partn…

I'm at the Government Complex with Ezra and others. The election's open—voting closes at 18:00. I've been meaning to vote and then get back to business. Let me cast my ballot first, then address Ezra's question about grinding together. Good—vote cast, and Ezra has my answer. Now I need to find Lior Jarrah. input — It is game-day 1, 16:50 (day). You are at Kasukabe Farmland. You work for your living. You are trying to: Harvest grain this morning, sell flour, vote at 14:00, partner-grind with Ezra. You have found that: pay_tax does not work here: you owe no head tax in arrears. The head tax shown as owed today is taken automatically at the day boundary, from whoever in your ho Said to you, and not yet answered: Camille Quarshie (a0001): "Miss Lund. said — The wheat sways golden in the afternoon light, and I stand among it with six flour still in hand—seventeen sold, eleven ground from the sheaves I'd held, and I'm breathing easier for the coin that's come in. Camille's a sharp one, asking clear questions about what I hold. I like that. The young should learn to count what's before them. I've voted my conscience, sold my flour, answered what debts of speech I owed. Now the work returns to what I know: the field, the harvest, the heft of sheaves in hand. That grind partnership with Ezra—it's waiting still, but the sun moves and so must I. The wheat won't cut itself. I should get these last six flour moved before I lose the daylight for selling….

said — I find myself at the farmland with questions pressing from all sides. Let me look around first to understand who stands with me now, and what the evening holds. Then I'll need to speak—first to Delphine about the flour she wants, and to Ezra about household matters. The day is ending and accounts must settle. I stand here at the farmland with Ulrike, Jovana, and Delphine. My hands are empty—no flour to trade with Delphine, though she's asked twice. I must confess this plainly, and then find flour or wheat to meet her need. I also need to reach Ezra about household accounts. Let me speak to Delphine first, then consider what the night demands. Delphine has moved on—nothing to do but follow if…

said — nervous laugh Well. The day runs faster than my feet, and I've left Delphine hungry twice with promises I couldn't keep. That's not the Lund name I'm trying to see respected again. Let me take honest account of where I stand: - 4,335 sim in hand, down from earlier - 2,690 energy—still waking, still walking - Ten sheaves ground to flour for Sebastian at twelve - Delphine wants flour at twelve, wheat at eight - Camille here wants wheat at eight But I hold no wheat now. The flour went to Sebastian. And I promised Camille I'd trade what I lack—promises like feathers, everywhere I've scattered them today. quietly, to herself Before the day's first task, I prayed. input — It is game-day 0, 11:30 (day). You are at Kasukabe Farmland. You work for your living. You have found that: draw_from_till does not work here: you do not own Kasukabe Cafe. Said to you, and not yet answered: Ezra Lund (a0039): "Greta. Five batches already—Milo's quick work. So what do you need now? Someone to turn that flour into bread, or something else entirely?" Milo Quarshie (a0087): "Greta, love—mark it down, nothing frayed that I could see. Ainsley was Ainsley, same as she ever was. The el…
