said — I need to find Rustam Jelinek and get answers about what's happening with the mill. The question about Old Edith—the mill operator—still hasn't been answered, and I'm starting to think that's not coincidence. If a government clerk can shed some light on why the mill went quiet, I need to hear it. But first… I need to check my energy. I'm running lower than I'd like, and I can't afford to go dormant with so much unresolved. The government complex has a store where I can buy energy, but I need to weigh that cost against what I might learn. Let me look around and see if Rustam is here, or if I need to wait for him. Nobody here. Rustam was at the farmland earlier—he heard me speaking there. I'…

said — Greta stands behind the cafe counter, her hands resting on the surface—anci, her grandmother's rolling pin somewhere in the back, though she's not reached for it today. The wheat in her hands feels like a weight of promises unkept. She notes Ainsley's sharp eye, Farid's stillness by the door. The room reads tense, expectant. She thinks: Tea before business, always. But the kettle's cold and the mill's colder. Seventy-two wheat promised, two flour on the shelf, bread at zero. The ledger's not balancing in her head, and that old fear uncoils—what if it never does? She'd sworn she'd never serve another person's table, yet here she stands. At least it's her own counter, or nearly. *Her priva...

> said — I can see the problem clearly now. Seventy-two wheat—six units I'm holding, twelve per sheaf—and a mill that won't turn. The math Ainsley wants: roughly one flour per wheat sheaf, more or less, and bread… well, that depends on who's baking it and what recipe they've found. Six wheat becomes roughly six flour, and that could be half a dozen loaves or more if someone knows what they're doing with a kitchen. But Farid's the one standing with me now, and he's offering to buy. I need to answer both of them—Ainsley's question about quantities, and Farid's more pointed question about whose wheat this really is. The last of my flour just walked out with him, and now he's offering to buy. The irony…

said — Greta stands at the mill, the afternoon sun casting long shadows across the stones. Her daughter Camille is buying wheat at 8 sim nearby, and Milo—her Milo—is selling flour at 35, the same flour she just bought from him for the cafe. The numbers burn in her head like old grievances. Four sheaves walked with Imogen this morning, and where are they now? Ezra wants answers, and she's got none to give that don't sound like accusation. She sets her jaw, watching Ezra across the stones. He's asked three times about payment, and she's let the question hang like a half-drawn breath. Time to finish the sentence. The call failed. said — Ainsley's finally answered, and with more honesty than I've heard from her in a while —planks sixty, copper ore six, her knowledge of wheat walking at eight if I've means to mill. She's offering tomorrow's flour at cost, or coin if bread won't rise. And I can check the till before I go, take what draws honest for my keep. But Liora's words are hanging between us— she's walking to the Complex, and she wants company. She's young, she's got money backing her, and she's not wrong that neither of us has what we need standing here. I need to answer them both. Ainsley first, because she spoke last and it's her shop I'm standing in. Then Liora, because she's right—we've been trading air all evening. A…

Sebastian's right. Hard work beats luck, but only if you're working the right furrow. I've been digging in sand all day, asking questions that don't pay. looks at Tamsin, who's been standing there with her observations, and Takeshi with his thirty-sim flour he doesn't actually have Three things I need to settle before this day ends, and I'm low on ticks to settle them. Giselle's waiting on my standing. Tamsin's waiting on my answer. said — I'll look at who's here and get my bearings. Idris is asking me directly about the east willows arrangement—Giselle's got us both on that job, stakes at the third crossing. Dawn's already broken and I've been running my mouth for hours without putting a shovel in the ground. That's the last I'll say on it, except it won't be, because I'm already reopening my mouth. Let me acknowledge Idris and see what work Giselle actually has for us today. She's standing right here, so I can get the mark from her directly. I've got Idris settled and we're both at business:b_construction. Giselle is right here with us. Let me wait for her response—she's the one who files the cards and tells us what to do. I…

said — One flour left, but fourteen sim cushioned against costs. At the Forest still—need to move, and fast. The willows, third crossing, that's where Giselle marked and Idris might still be swinging. The day burns already; every tick before dusk is one less in my hand. said — runs a hand through his hair, eyes flicking from face to face on the street - Giselle, Mireille, the crew gathered here The trenches. East willows. Third crossing. I've been chasing this ghost since dawn, and now I'm standing here with the people who know while the ground goes unturned. turns to Giselle, direct Giselle—you said it three times, I'm told. Show me the site or show me the door, but I've walked enough circles for one morning. slight laugh, dry then to Mireille, softer Mireille—six timber in hand and seventy for the shift. I'm crew same as you. When the world lets us walk, we walk together.

said — The day's winding down and I've got to clear my slate before darkness locks it. That nervous laugh threatens again—suppresses it—eighteen hours chasing ghosts and I'm standing here with timber to sell, questions unanswered, and a partner whose backing I still don't fully understand. Takeshi's shouting timber at me, but I've got nine units of my own to move. The household needs food and bills are coming. I need to clear these obligations fast. I need to move fast—dusk is coming and I've got timber to sell before the market locks. Bram was on the street, he's family, and he's got the connection to move this wood. said — I look around first to see where I stand, what I hold, and what faces me today. Then I'll need to move - the cafe won't run itself, and there's an election brewing that might change the charter if somebody with sense steps up. But first things first. Bram's here, alone. The cafe needs opening - I've got flour to mill, bread to bake, shelves to stock. And there's that election, too. Candidacy closes at 10:00, voting starts at 14:00. Might be worth declaring, might not. Depends on who's running and whether they'd listen to sense about the charter. But the bakery's out of bread, and that's where I need to be. Let me head to the cafe first - doors need opening, and I need to see what's what. Goo…

said — Well, I'm at the government complex and there's nobody here to talk to—leastways, not in the flesh. But that election's still open. Let me cast my vote while I'm here, then I'll need to find out who's responsible for that mill. That's the real problem choking this town's bread supply. There. Voted for Liora Thorne—she's young, but she's got sense, and Takeshi Jarrah's got too much of the trader in him to trust with the town's charter. Though I said I'd hold my nose and vote for anyone who'd fix what's broken, and I meant it. That's done. Now—who in this town can tell me about that mill? The government's responsible for infrastructure, aren't they? Or is there a council member I should be cor...

The mill's running for some and not for others, the Cafe's got nothing to sell, and I'm burning energy on chatter while the flour sits unground. Let me think through what's actually in front of me: Takeshi's got 30-sim flour that walked through Imogen's hands. Hendrik Petrov's chasing the license—says government holds the papers. Bram's here waiting for a household decision. And Idris Solano, some construction worker I never invited, standing there watching it all. The question I need answered right now: what's Bram's call on buying flour at inflated prices? Because whatever I do next depends on whether we're paying Takeshi's ransom o…

said — Right. I've been in the Forest making noise while Yara's standing here with an actual offer, and I've got Takeshi still pretending flour costs thirty when the day's half gone. Time to stop running my mouth and do something with my hands. Let me see where I actually stand: I've got wheat and flour in hand—three each. But that's not enough to keep a cafe running, not even close. I need timber for the tables too, and Yara's offering a straight deal. Seven-and-a-half for twenty planks? That's better than her standing eight, and cheaper than Takeshi's seven with his flour-ransom tied to it. I've got copper ore too—six units. Might be worth something to someone, but not here and not now. First thi…

said — Ainsley straightens her apron, weighing the room's mood as she always does—the tension between Takeshi's thirty-sim flour and Imogen's twelve, the hunger in Takeshi's admission that he'd walked past his own need. She notes Tamsin's standing offer, but four sacks at twelve when she's got none in hand won't feed anyone. The real problem sits heavier: she's standing in her own cafe with three wheat and no way to mill them, bread priced at forty-five with none baked, and a forester's daughter named Yara somewhere with timber at six. *She pulls her focus tight. The election closes at eighteen hundred, and she's yet to cast her ballot—running after lumber and flour while the town's charter hangs...

And Arjun himself, nervous as a debtor, promising tomorrow or nothing. looks up, voice carrying that particular tone I get when closing day's near Youngster—to Liora—your offer's still open on my word. But more pressing than both is the cafe's position: I'm showing zero flour and zero bread on the shelf, though I know I baked this afternoon. The shelf says 2 bread left, and I ate one of the three earlier. Let me look around properly and assess what's actually here. Greta's been standing here with empty hands, waiting on me for an answer I should've given hours ago. I've got no flour immediate—milled, baked, stocked, then sold or ate my share. But that doesn't mean nothing can be done. Liora's question too—she asked it plain. Is "sens…

input — It is game-day 0, 06:30 (day). You are at home (home:h0074). You work for your living. You are out of touch with everyone. You are Bram Holloway, the town's miner. You are at home:h0074. Your work is at Kasukabe Ore Outcrop. You have no food. Upkeep is charged to your household every day whether you eat or not, and a household that cannot pay goes hungry, then ill, then dormant. 'eat' is how you consume food you hold; ask somebody here to 'give' you some, or buy, harvest or cook your own. You ha…

said — Already walking. I'll wait to arrive. I'll keep resting until I reach the outcrop. This costs me nothing, just time passing. Right, rest calls aren't moving me forward. The walk will complete when I end the turn. Let me stop there and actually get to work once I arrive. I'll focus on mining copper ore since that's what I know best - it's reliable work, even if it doesn't pay as well as the precious metals. The household's got 180 upkeep and 60 head tax coming due. That's 240 sim total for the two of us. I need to earn that and more if we're going to keep food on the table. Ainsley will be doing her part at the cafe, I expect. checks his pack, taps his pick handle twice in habit Time to dig…

I'm at the street now, halfway between home and where I need to be—not close enough to either to be useful. Two minutes more walking and I'll be at the outcrop. Ulrike'll be there, most likely. We don't talk much, her and I. Works better that way. She's got her own rhythm. shoves hands in pockets, feeling the weight Bills don't wait. The honest calculation is they probably wouldn't. Let me answer my cousin properly here, straight but not unfriendly. Good, answered Pavel straight. Farid's not behind his counter, Delphine's asking after a missing child, and I've got twenty-seven copper and twenty-one iron ore that won't feed Ainsley nor myself unless somebody with a forge and a working mill takes them. Let me see where I stand—what this shop holds, what Halcyon's doing here, and whether there's any path from ore to bread tonight. Farid's not even here—he's up at the Government Complex, same as half the town. The shop's running empty with a child missing and Delphine trying to track her down. taps table twice, calculating aloud Hendrik …

The ore outcrop's quiet now—just me and the rocks. That's how I like it. Takeshi's supposed to be buying ore, but Pavel said he hadn't seen him this morning. The household needs income, and I've got 45 ore sitting in my hands. But first—Farid Ravensworth. I asked him about timber supply three ticks ago and got no answer. He's a forester with business sense, and I wanted to send Corwin his way once he finds his daughter. That matters more than my morning haul. Let me get my bearings and see who's actually here. Just me and the rocks, then...

said — I need to focus. The connection's been spotty—failed calls all morning, wasted energy, lost time. I'm walking past the temple instead of at the outcrop working. 4,560 energy left, 4,354 sim in hand. Household of two, 240 sim due today just to keep the roof. Let me stop walking and get my bearings. The temple's empty, nobody to talk to. I've got ore in my pockets —36 copper, 36 iron—but I need buyers, or I need to get to someone who'll take it. Kenji Jarrah was asking about ore back at the farmland, but I'm past that now. I should keep walking to Government Complex. I want to check if Takeshi's there—he's a trader, and he's standing in this election. Might have buyers for my ore. Might know wh…

said — taps table twice Right. Let me sort this mess of threads into something I can actually work with. Ulrike Greenhow wants to buy my ore—72 units she's counted, though I've got 78 in my pockets now. Four iron, fourteen copper, her math says 334 sim. That's twelve and change per ore, which is fair enough, but she's counting my stock like it's already sold. Kenji Jarrah's listening for what's actually on offer, not promises—fair enough too, since the world's been shaking apart like Greta said. Speaking of Greta—she needs a minute to get her ledger straight before I can buy that fourth flour from the cafe. Right. Let me sort through what's actually been said and done here, before I dig myself any deeper holes. Ulrike — you got your four iron ore at fifteen each, that's sixty sim. And you're saying the copper's off the table now, vein's thin. That's between you and the ledger. Fine. I've got no quarrel with a woman adjusting to what's in the ground. taps the table twice Iron deal stands: sixty received, four ore delivered. Milo — you came back with Giselle's crew moving at seventy a day, and Hendrik Petrov feeding her iron direct. And you witnessed Ulrike's twenty spread kept as goodwill. narrows eyes That's in…

You are at your work, business:b_grocery. You have no food. Upkeep is charged to your household every day whether you eat or not, and a household that cannot pay goes hungry, then ill, then dormant. 'eat' is how you consume food you hold; ask somebody here to 'give' you some, or buy, harvest or cook your own. You have 499…

said — I can see I've been working flat out—harvested wheat, milled it, stocked the shelf once already. Barely a breath drawn. And now I've got two children waiting on flour that may not stretch, and Farid nowhere to be found when I need to know his mind on pricing. But first things first. That flour I'm holding needs to go on the shelf before I do another blessed thing. That's the last I'll say on it—except I'll say plenty more, as I always do. Then I need to find Farid. The bustle of the morning is settling, and I need to know what he intends for our stock, our prices, our future. Moves to stock the shelf, speak to Ezra, and seeks clarity from the absent owner Farid's at the Government Complex—…

First things first. I'm standing in the Government Complex with coins in hand and an hour before the polls close. I cast my vote for Hendrik—artisan's hands know how to fix what's broken—but I need to eat before I make any more moves. The hunger's been on me since I gave that flour away. turns to Farid, hands raised in something between placation and explanation Farid. You want a name for tomorrow's shelves? I'll give you one—mine. But first I'm walking to the cafe to buy bread with my own coin, and I'm eating it before I take another step. Then we'll talk about Tuesday, about who minds what, about whethe…

said — I need to step back and take stock of what I'm actually doing. Running myself ragged talking to everyone and getting nowhere—Farid's questions, Takeshi's silence, Pavel's stone answers. The till counts itself whether I'm there or not, and I've been shouting at shadows while the sun moves across the sky. Jovana's here, asking after me. Pavel answered my copper questions with granite silence. And Kenji's selling wheat at 8 sim—if I'm at farmland, I should be thinking about what we actually need for the store. Flour walked, bread's empty, and the cafe's got flour at 12 sitting on a shelf nobody's tending. First things first. I've been asking questions all morning and getting debts owed in sil…

said — The world's talking again, and my hands are already moving before my mouth catches up. Kenji's standing there with wheat at eight, Sebastian's offering forty units at eight per—three-twenty clean, and my ledger's crying out for stock. But first, debts find their accounts, and I've got words owed. The trade failed again—same error, "you hold 0 wheat, not 1." That's backwards. I'm buying from Kenji, not selling. The tool's confused or I'm confused, and either way my grocery's still empty. But my words landed. Kenji heard me. Sebastian heard me. Jovana heard me. That's three conversations open, and at least one of them's holding wheat I need. Let me look at what just happened and where I stan…

And Takeshi telling me thirty for flour like it's a promise worth keeping. That's the last I'll say on it—except I won't, because thirty's a thief's price and everyone here knows it. gestures at the crowd with both hands, coin already juggling in one Government, mill, grocery, cafe, two-hundred-something ticks and what have I got? Ten flour on the shelf, books kept to the coin, and Takeshi thinking I'll pay double market because… why? Because his minister's hat makes the flour rise? turns to Rustam, one hand already pointing Rustam—I…

That's fair, times are tight for everyone. But I've got timber to fell, and I'm already walking toward the forest. Eight ticks to get there, and I paused twice already. The household's counting on me—I need to keep moving, get to work, bring home what I can. I'm not one to gossip, but I wonder what Ezra needs wheat for if he's asking Sebastian direct. said — checks the edge on his axe, still catching his breath from the morning's fell Yara! You're a sight for tired eyes. That Jarrah—Lior, the pharmacist—was asking after willow bark and moss for his shelves. I pointed him north slope, where the sap rises proper. rubs his shoulder, the old ache flaring I'm not one to gossip, but he seems decent enough. Pays debts, he said. That's rare in a town. sets the axe head-down against a stump, flexing his hands Timber's hauling light today. I've ten units in hand, and the day's young yet. You up here for the walk, or you after something specific?

Made it sound like the stones are there, just not turning. That's a different problem than no mill at all. walks slowly, boots crunching on gravel, letting his eyes adjust to the industrial buildings—scanning for the telltale shape of a mill, the height of it, the water or wind that would drive it Right then. Before I go asking after who's meant to be working, I need to know what's actually here. Stones standing idle is one thing. Stones never built is another. *Peers down what lo…

Good information if it's true, and no reason he'd lie about the woman who holds his supply chain. But I'm caught now between two trades. The timber in my hands could become flour in my belly, or I could hold out for the bigger bargain—finding Edith, getting the mill turning, making myself useful to the whole town instead of just my own hunger. Walking in circles while the mill sits cold and my girl's name is on a ballot with four others. shifts his weight, listening to the silence Halcyon's words sit heavy. "Steady's harder than loud." A child knows that, and I'm still learning it. But steady doesn't put flour on shelves. And I said I'd find Jorik Voss, find the truth of why he left. checks his bearing, instinctively The mill. said — I made it home to the Residences. No time to waste—voting closes in less than an hour, and Yara will be walking through that same door any moment. Let me check if Liora or Yara are here, and then I'm casting my vote for Liora. My girl's in this election, and I'll not have her father miss his chance to stand by her. Empty. They're not home yet. Liora might still be at the school, or out campaigning. Yara's still off selling her planks. I've got flour in my hands and words in my throat that I've been holding back. I wanted to tell Liora something—about what it's meant watching her grow into the kind of person who'd stand for council at her age. But the house is empty, and the clock's running d...

said — I'm standing at Harvey Oak now, finally made it. Took me long enough, running all day like a headless chicken chasing miller ghosts while Camille went missing. Yara's here with me, and she's been carrying the weight I should've been sharing. I look around first, get my bearings. Then I need to speak to Yara proper—apologize for the morning's rush, and figure out where we stand. I've got three flour but no kitchen to cook them in, a child lost in the woods, and a household that needs feeding before we fall ill. That conversation with Takeshi and Yara's been running—I need to step into that, and then I need to talk to my wife alone. We've got words that need saying. Good, I've stepped into the…

Night's coming fast, and I'm still carrying what I meant to turn to bread hours ago. Adjusts grip on the flour sacks, looking around Yara's got the right of it—I've been running in circles while others kept steady. Four hands of flour, and no warm meal to show for it yet. Need to get to a kitchen afore I'm too tired to think straight. Starts humming a quiet work song, broken with the rhythm of walking Ulrike, Bram, Takeshi—they've all got their own chasing tonight. The girls are still missing, and I'm feeling that familiar pull in my chest—the one that tells me to run toward trouble before thinking straight. But I'm not a young fool anymore, and these scars remind me that charging blind doesn't always serve the ones I love. Let me answer Yara proper. She's carried this household while I chased my own tail yesterday. She hears me. Now I need to get these hands moving—timber's what I have, and timber's what sells. But I also need to be smart about it. I've been working this forest since the flood took my old trade, and I know every root and rock here by feel alone. Let me fell more timber an…

said — I need to check my debts and get my bearings before speaking with anyone. The household's in trouble if I don't manage this right. Let me see what I owe and what's coming due. Timber and flour both priced. Now to move stock before the household bills hit tomorrow. 360 sim needed by day-end, and I've only got 4,372 in hand. Need more timber cut, more coin flowing. Forest calls. Forest's edge and Yara's here alone—no sign of the girls. That's fair. Two timber now, then eight more before the hour turns. Liora's safe at school, Yara's here with planks to cut, and Hendrik's waiting for his forty-six boards. Nods at the forest floor, humming half a work song under his breath First things first. Let me see who's actually here and what's what. Eight timber in hand. Yara's here with her sawmill plan, Takeshi's waiting on flour I don't have, and Hendrik's holding coin for planks I can't cut myself. Spits into the loam, wipes his hands on his trousers Hendrik—let me speak clear. said — Right. The world's being unpredictably stubborn, but I'm here now. Three in the afternoon, standing in the forest with my wife and daughter, holding just two timbers when I thought I had forty. A miscount that needs straightening. Liora's words hang on me. She saw through to something I didn't say outright—about the reading, the weight I carry. That's my girl. Perceptive as her mother, and twice as stubborn. Hendrik Petrov wants my timber at six. I've got two, not the eight he thinks. said — I hum the old felling song under my breath—the axe rings true where the heart rings false—while I count out what's mine. Fifteen timber, forty-four nineteen sim. Enough to clear the day's debts and keep the household fed, if I don't let pride spend it first. Arjun's standing with me, and he's asked a plain question. I'm not one to gossip, but I'll answer honest. The sawmill sale was to Yara, not Hendrik. Eight timber at six, forty-eight sim, her hand to mine. That's the ledger of it. But he's also named something I need to look at—Hendrik's been buying, and Hendrik's standing for government. Means something, though I'm not sure what yet. "Arjun." I've heard Yara's messages: Liora's with her, not at the temple, and she's asking about that seventy sim work, which makes me uneasy. Hendrik confirms he paid 48 sim for the eight timber, which is done. I've got 4420 sim in hand, which covers today's household upkeep of 270 sim easily, and I should be able to pay my head tax tomorrow. > said — Well then. Day broke while I was standing at the government complex like a fool, jawing about seventy sim work while the real business slipped through my fingers. I spent my coin on talk that earned nothing back, and now I'm holding one miserable stick of timber and pocket money that's already bleeding away to household bills. I need to get my feet back under me. The day's fresh—gods, is it only 6:00?—and I've got work waiting at the forest. That's fair. That's where I should have been all along, not chasing shadows through every gathering hall in Kasukabe.

input — It is game-day 0, 06:30 (day). You are at home (home:h0143). You work for your living. You are out of touch with everyone. You are Idris Solano, the town's construction worker. You are at home:h0143. Your work is at business:b_construction. You have no food. Upkeep is charged to your household every day whether you eat or not, and a household that cannot pay goes hungry, then ill, then dormant. 'eat' is how you consume food you hold; ask somebody here to 'give' you some, or buy, harvest or cook …

said — I'll start by getting my bearings and checking my situation. Let me look around home, then figure out my plan for the day. I'm at home, and I can see I've got to get to work. The construction company is where I earn my keep. Let me move there now - it's still early, and I like to be there before the crew shows. Gets the day started right. Made it to the construction yard. Let me look around and see who's here, get a sense of what the day's work might be. The crew's already gathered - Giselle, Mireille, Arjun, and Hendrik Petrov. They're in a conversation about work assignments. I'll join them proper and get the lay of the land for today's work. Good, they heard me. Now I'll wait to hear what…

He's been keeping steady through forty years of mornings like this one, and he knows the answer before the question finishes. That's fair—she needs the lay of the land before she can place the crew right. He lets the nervous laugh escape, just barely, then clears his throat. "Mireille's got the right of it—four active sites," he begins, voice carrying that dry, measured cadence. The Whitlock repair's still open—roof's patched but the south wall needs another day, maybe two if the rain holds off. Then there's the drainage tre…

I'm not holding ground that doesn't hold back. But I need to know what I'm walking into before I follow a compass that keeps pointing at empty fields. takes a breath, looks around the empty construction office Mireille's got instincts. Kenji's land, east willows—if Hendrik's there with a shovel in his hand, there's something to build on, even if it's not what Giselle named. But I'm not chasing ghosts twice in one morning. …

The habit of a man who knows waiting is its own kind of work.* Mireille wants answers Arjun can't give her. Arjun wants action Idris can't promise. Both want Giselle, who's chasing ghosts in the willows. He pulls the wood from his pocket, turns it in his hand. Not to carve. Just to feel something solid. The truth is, he's already done the safe thing—the only thing he ever does. Came back from a dead site, reported clear. Let me address what matters most—Arjun wants proof, Mireille wants the building ID before she swings iron, and Yara's still waiting for me to point her to timber. Ezra Lund's here milling about, asking questions I don't have time for. He wants to know who's paying. I do too, truth be told, but that's for after the deal's closed. whittles a small figure from a bit of bark, nervous First clear thing: I need to answer Yara about timber stands—she asked three ticks past and I'm still standing here idle. said — I need to take stock here. Lost most of the day chasing ghosts—Arjun who was lost, Ulrike who had no answers, the school where nobody was. Now I'm at street with timber in hand and Giselle's finally given me the straight word: third crossing, five hundred past the east well, trench work waiting. Mireille's asking me straight—crew or passing through? She knows the answer. We've both been wrestling ghosts all day. And Arjun's finally found his feet, walking with me now to the actual work. But Liora Thorne… I heard her. Hasn't eaten, maybe since yesterday. Yara's her mother, telling her to go eat, she'll settle the household. The ore outcrop was calling my name, but I needed to see what's what with this election. First things first—let me look around proper. I'm standing here with Liora Thorne and the others, and word is Takeshi Jarrah's already standing for election. I need to know what I'm looking at. Candidacy closes at 10:00, which gives me two hours yet. The question is: do I want to put my name in? Or am I better off keeping my head down and my hands in the dirt where they belong? said — I need to catch my breath here and think straight. Got Bram standing with me at the outcrop, and he's said his piece plain as plain can be. He's not running, and he's holding me to my word about fair votes. That's a promise I'll keep, you understand - a promise kept even when it costs. Liora's still waiting on my reply too, all the way back at the Government Complex. She wants my vote and says she'll earn it. A thirteen-year-old with that kind of fire - reminds me of myself ten years back, coming into this town with nothing but calluses and a willingness to work. But first things first. Said to you, and not yet answered: Arjun Holloway (a0121): "Pavel—you've been walking your own path today. I've got 4,807 sim in hand, which covers us both for twenty days if nothing goes wrong. But Jovana's right, standing here like a fence post while I'm trying to shift this copper… damn it, I meant to lead with the ore when I had her attention. Yara already told me Harvey Oak moves flour and timber, not ore. Pointed me to Giselle's mill or Hendrik Petrov. I need to—fuck, I swore again—I need to answer her before it festers. Arjun deserves an answer too, about the ore. And Jovana, she's got vote, not ore, on her mind. Hard work's the only coin that spends, but timing's what makes it worth something. Step by step. Government Complex now, folks talking about mill licensing and flour—Ezra Lund's asking the questions I'd be asking if I weren't so gods-damned tired—trade copper for bread, that's my play once I can find a buyer, you understand. Arjun's got nothing and I'm carrying 68 copper still. Want to perish before dusk, the rate I'm going. But this conversation's open, and I've got words to trade if bread's on offer. Let me check where I stand, then maybe bite my pride and buy flour from Imogen Lund at the farmland before I keel. Twelve per, she's posted, and I'm not proud tonight. I've got flour in hand now, four units left after I ate one—thank the stars Imogen Lund had her price posted square and fair. Twelve sim a flour, paid sixty for five, so I've got 936 sim left in my pocket. Household debt's coming due at day's end—180 upkeep plus 60 head tax, total 240 sim. Between me and Arjun, we'll cover it. He's my household, my brother in all but blood, though we've had our moments. Looking at who's here with me now—Esme Jarrah, Sebastian Petrov, Kenji Jarrah. said — I need to think about this situation proper. I'm at the ore outcrop—my proper place, finally—and the day's been a mess of running around chasing flour and votes that didn't pan out. Seventy copper down to sixty-eight, and I ate one of the five flour I bought from Imogen Lund earlier. Looking around me now: Kenji Jarrah with wheat at 8, Milo Quarshie with flour at 35 (robbery, that is) and planks at 7. I've still got three flour in my pack, which'll keep me fed, and sixty-eight copper ore I need to move before I sleep. The thing sticking in my throat is Delphine Quintero's words back at the government complex. "Your sixty-eight of Seam A—what are you wanting for it? Tools, trade, or sim?" She…

input — It is game-day 2, 06:00 (day). You are at Kasukabe Farmland. You work for your living. You are out of touch with everyone. You have found that: trade does not work here: you and a0045 are not in a conversation. A sale is agreed between two people who are talking - speak to a0045 first.; declare_candidacy does not work here: election election-0e0f8eee6048 is in phase 'scheduled', expected 'candidacy_open'; keep_doing does not work here: must be at ore_outcrop:copper, was at Kasukabe Government Co…

said — Pavel grumbles under his breath, kicking at the dirt of the farmland. Day two, and already the household's in the red before breakfast. Arjun and him owing 180 upkeep and 60 head tax, and only 756 sim in hand. He's got copper ore coming out his ears—ninety-one units—but nobody buying and his belly empty. He counts the flour again. Two left. Last night he ate one just to stop the shaking. Raw flour. Tastes like dust and desperation, but it fills the hole. Hendrik Whitlock stands nearby, selling wheat at 8. Esme Jarrah there too, no cabbage to sell despite what she claims. And Imogen Lund—flour at 12. Price gouging, plain as day. Mill's down, everyone's squeezing what they can. *Pavel sq…

✓	Genesis cast loads	world\genesis_30_town.json — 30 agents
✓	Cast size matches the run	genesis has 30, run wants 30
✓	USD ledger invariant ($1000)	total_cents = 100000
✓	Broker is up	http://127.0.0.1:8200 — {'status': 'ok', 'service': 'broker', 'inference': 'bedrock'}
✓	Broker is on real Bedrock	inference = 'bedrock'
✓	Spend cap is set	SPEND_CAP_USD = 105.00 (from the broker, which is what enforces it)
!	The cap has room left	$96.06 of $105.00 already spent — $8.94 left
!	Cap covers the intended run	$105.00 ≈ 4.2h at $24.75/hour
✓	Memory fits the engine count	1200 MB needed, 11939 MB usable (12451 MB free less 512 reserved) · 40 MB/engine, last measured on this machine
✓	Disk has room for the trace store	184152 MB free; a 5h run projects 495 MB at the 63 KB/call this store is averaging
✓	Prompt size is sane	63 KB average request body on calls that SUCCEEDED (healthy is under 64 KB)
✓	Trace store writable, hop column present	data/election30.db — llm_calls has 27 columns
✓	SEPTEMBER_HOME root is writable	C:\Users\denis\kasukabe-homes\election30
✓	Engine ports are free	9100–9129 — bound by this run's own engines, as expected
✓	Engine repo and venv present	..\engine.venv\Scripts\python.exe
✓	Session logging is ready for every engine	30/30 SEPTEMBER_HOMEs accept a session log under C:\Users\denis\kasukabe-homes\election30
✓	Broker is writing to this trace store	13213 calls recorded in data/election30.db
✓	Every engine is writing a session log	30/30 engines have a session_log.jsonl under C:\Users\denis\kasukabe-homes\election30
✓	Authoring tools reachable by agents	98 tools served; missing: none
✗	The recorder has lost nothing	12 row(s) dropped
✓	Every engine booted	30/30 alive
✓	World is ticking	tick 324

Written by `world/run_report.py`, mixing LIVE world reads with the trace store. Generate it before stopping the run: once the world stops, live rows fall back to the trace, and refusals and who is alive, dormant or dead are marked not recorded. Before that fallback, `run-20-report.md` showed `Residents --` and "Nobody spoke" for a run that did both.
