I gave him straight what I could: no work tonight, but dawn tomorrow at the east patch with Jovana. That's settled honest. But I've also got these three words left unspoken—Yara, Hendrik, Delphine—and the hour's getting late. Hendrik owes me flour or an explanation, and that's a household matter I won't let lie. Yara's waiting on a trade that might come. Delphine's gone quieter than I thought she would. I don't like leaving debts unanswered, neither owing nor owed. That's the tally I keep, and it keeps me. said — *Sebastian stands at the farmland, two sheaves of wheat in hand, watching the motley crew around him. Ulrike and Jovana are here—good workers, both. Kenji's standing by like he's waiting for direction. And Milo, no offense, pricing flour like it's gold dust at thirty-five. He sets his jaw, feeling the weight of the morning's failures. Hendrik—his own household's Hendrik—still owing flour he never delivered. But he gave Arjun word, and a man's word is his bond, even when the bond stretches thin. *The wheat in his hands reminds him: he promised Jovana forty sim for twelve sheaves. That's labor he can fulfill. That's coin he can earn. That's a ledger entry he can balance, no matter what Hend…

Ezra, Kenji, and Milo are here with me, and I know Kenji's a farmer too. Might as well see if anyone needs a hand while I wait for Sebastian to show his face. First things first—let me see what exactly needs doing around here and who's got work for me. I'm not one to gossip, but Kenji's right here and he's got his own plots. said — Right then. Walking with Kenji to the market—the man's been patient as a stone while I've been scattered across half the town following promises I made. Got Hendrik Petrov wanting wheat at forty sim for thirteen, Arjun asking about construction work, and me still owing Kenji that help I promised him this morning. Market first, ballot second, wheat settlement third. That's the rhythm now. Ulrike's selling planks at eight, Yara's here too. Takeshi's in the conversation about the vote—I'm not one to gossip, but a trader's ear is where money talks clearest. Let me get to the market, find Kenji, and see what's what. Let's look at what's actually happening here before I go running off again like a chicken with its head cut. Been walking all over creation this morning —farmland to grocery to street and back again. Sold my ten sheaves to Hendrik for thirty each, that was honest work. But I scattered myself thin, didn't I? Chasing Kenji across the town like a fool. Never caught him, and meanwhile there's Sebastian standing right here with tomorrow's work in his hand. Got to stop, Jovana. Just… stop and breathe. Sebastian's still here. Good. said — Looking at where I stand—Government Complex, where the voting happens, and I've got a head full of debts to settle before the day turns. My household's on the hook for 180 upkeep and 60 head tax come day's end, and I've only got 4,848 sim in hand with two wheat left to work with. Voted already for Takeshi, so that's done proper. But Kenji Jarrah—I've owed him a straight answer since this morning when I scattered my promises across half the town. Let me see who's here first, then I'll find my husband and settle what's between us. Farid's here, and I'm standing with him proper. Time to settle what's between us—honest accounting for the day, and I need to know if he's holding enough for the hou…

I miscounted somewhere in the rush, or I let my mouth run ahead of my memory. Either way, it's a lie that needs fixing before it sits. turns to face Farid directly Farid—look at me. You're right, and I'm not one to double down when I'm cornered by truth. Thirteen sheaves harvested. Ten sold to Hendrik Whitlock. One eaten raw because I was stupid with hunger. That leaves two, not three, and those two went to the mill. I don't know where fourteen came from—maybe I was counting what I wished I had, maybe I was just scattered...

said — Fucking hell, what a mess. I'm standing at the Farmland with three wheat in my hand, Kenji's talking fair about what I ate, and I've got debts pressing and no food. Let me take stock. Kenji's being straight with me—six in my belly, three in hand, he's got seven, and he's calling it honest ground. That's more than I expected from a friend-of-a-friend dealing. And he's right, dammit. I ate six because I was hungry and I didn't think past my own throat. Cannot let pride cost me the same friendship twice. Ulrike's still waiting on word about Kenji's field. Tamsin's here too, and Milo's hawking flour at thirty-five with the bakery empty. Times are tight all around. First thing first—I'm hungry, a…

said — feels the familiar gnaw in her gut, not just hunger but the kind of frustration that comes from a day's work tangled in words instead of wages Right then. Kenji's got my seven sheaves and is playing the same tune he opened with—offering dignity I didn't ask for while holding tight to coin I earned. Pavel's thrice-spoken about copper and hunger, and I'm standing here with empty hands and a ledger that won't balance itself. I'm not one to gossip, but for what it's worth—this Farmland's seen me eat six and cut thirteen and argue the count till I'm hoarse. I'm standing here at the farmland with Pavel asking after my belly—three times over by the looks of it—and Kenji still owes me word and wage both. Let me get my bearings and tend to what's standing right in front of me. Pavel's hungry and got copper to trade. Delphine's offering him the grocery's path—wheat in, flour out. I'm empty-handed for food too, my belly still hollow from that flour I ate earlier. But I've got 2380 sim and a witness shift at 1400 I need to keep whole. said — Right then. Let's take stock proper, shall we? Sebastian's holding out three sim for that thirteenth sheave—he says he's paid it twice in spirit, but spirit don't fill the belly. And Kenji's tapped that table twice now, thirty sim hand-to-hand to close the matter. I'm two-thirds down from forty, but fuck it, pride's already cost me once today. Giselle's hollering about east willows, trenches before sundown. Seventy sim for a day's dirt, and I've got flour to fuel it but not the energy to waste on standing here counting shadows with men who've bent their own words till they snap. The day's burning. said — I'm standing here on the street with Kenji tapping that table like I'm deaf, and Giselle hollering about trenches seventy sim away. Been running my mouth all day and my pockets are still only at 2304 sim—just enough to keep Farid and me fed and housed if I don't piss it away on pride. sigh Kenji's thirty would clear the wage debt clean. I'd take forty, sure, but thirty closes it without a fight, and I'm not one to let pride cost me the same friendship twice. Three voices, three paths, and I'm not one to let pride cost me a meal—or a friendship, even one I'm still earning. First, Ezra's asking about Lior Jarrah's grain. I'm not one to gossip, but I don't have that grain. Lior never sent me with nothing. I need to tell him straight before he thinks I'm holding out on him. Second, Imogen's offered me grind-work at dawn—Sebastian's forty wheat, meet at the mill afore sunrise. That's tomorrow's promise, and I'll keep it if I can. But tonight? She's got flour at twelve, or the grocery at fifteen. Twelve's dear…

said — Right then. I've fallen into my old pattern—working hard but not working smart. Eight separate calls to fell timber, and each one cost me a decision. No wonder I'm running low on energy before the day's half done. Lior Jarrah's asking after willow bark, and Corwin's here too. But I've got thirteen logs in my hands and a household bill coming due. Timber's only worth what someone'll pay for it, and I've got to find a buyer before I can call the day's work… trails off, thinking of the construction sites she's seen springing up Giselle Ingram's crew must need wood. said — I could feel the evening pressing in—voting closes at eighteen bells, and I was still halfway to Harvey Oak when I should've been turning toward the Government Complex. Corwin's words hung with me, heavy as wet timber. He'd said them plain, the way he only does when the day's almost done. The planks were burning a hole in my hands. Thirteen units at eight sim, and Mireille knew it. But I couldn't sell from the street—I'd tried, and the world had made its refusal plain. Needed to be at the forest to sell, apparently, though that made no kind of sense when the planks were already crafted and in my grip. Still walking, I realized: I'd been so set on Harvey Oak, on that thirty sim flour from Tak…

said — I sold 34 planks to Hendrik for 320 sim—less than his original offer of 368 for 46, but he was clear he's not buying more with 100 planks already in inventory. That's 9 planks worth of timber left, plus the 9 timber I hold, so 18 units total. I bought 8 more timber from Corwin at 6 each, so 48 sim spent there. 320 minus 48 is 272 profit on the day so far, not counting the crafting costs. Corwin's asking if the handshake with Hendrik still stands—Hendrik said he's not buying more, so that's done. Time to answer plain. Youngster's got a head full of sums and a mouth that runs faster than her feet some days. I'll give her what I can. I need to get back to the forest for more timber, build back …

said — I need to get my bearings and plan my day. As Hendrik Whitlock, I'm a college instructor who works harder than anyone—though it's barely 6:30 in the morning and I've got pressing matters to attend to before the college day begins. That election deadline is already weighing on me—candidacy closes at 10:00, and I'm not one to sit idle when there's a chance to make a difference, though I'll need to see what the lay of the land is first. Let me start by looking around to confirm where I am and what's immediately available. I can see the places around me. I need to head to Oak Hill College for work, but first I should check my financial situation and what I need to accomplish today. I have 5,000 …

A student who speaks that way deserves acknowledgment, even if I can't give it direct now. Let me take stock of what I know and what I'm doing. I'm walking to farmland to find food, and I've got 4951 sim. The cafe's dry, the bakery's dry, and I need to eat before I teach. Kenji Jarrah's the farmer I found, and I'm heading to farmland. Right now I'm standing at the Farmland with half the town's power gathered - Kenji, Giselle, Milo, the lot of them. And what's this? Kenji's pulling grain daily, he says, but the mill's turning slow and the bakery's empty. That's information worth more than any rumor I could trade at the cafe. I've been running around town gathering election intelligence and talking to half the population, but I still haven't eaten, and I'm standing at the farmland where Kenji's offering grain I can't mill. The mill's choked, so flour's scarce. I need to get fed before I teach, and I need to make a decision about how to handle this grain situation. Kenji's offering 12 sheaves at 2 sim each—that's 24 sim for standing grain I'd have to harvest myself. But without a working mill, I'd just have grain, not bread. said — The mill's choked but I've got flour in hand—three units, and ten sheaves of wheat besides. That's enough to keep a man fed through teaching hours, mark it down. The hunger's been driving me harder than it should, and I can sort proper meals once the college day ends. Looking at my position: I've gathered election intelligence across three conversations, collected on old favors, and my larder's not empty. The three flour I hold will cook into something, or I can barter it forward. The ten wheat's better milled, but that's work for later. The threads I've left dangling—Milo's promised flour in ten ticks, Jovana's holding grain at three sim a sheave, Mireille's hunting building work—I can't ch…

said — Let me think on this. I'm at the cafe, surrounded by prime sources of election gossip—Greta's practically handing me information on a plate, and I've got hungry students and empty stomachs both waiting on me. First order of business: I need that bread, and Ainsley's waiting on my answer. Forty-five for bread is steep when I've been eating raw wheat, but it's cooked and it keeps. Second: Greta's telling me things worth more than flour—about mills gone quiet, grain trades shifted, and voters who remember who fed them. I've been chasing food all morning when I should've been chasing votes. The polls open at 14:00, and I'm supposed to teach at the college. I need to eat first, gather what I can …

I've got 4,620 sim in hand, 90 upkeep and 30 head tax due at day-end, which I can cover easily. But I've made promises I haven't kept: to Mireille about the apology, to Ezra about the flour, to Camille about her sister. And I need to sort out this wheat confusion with Jovana—I thought she said thirty for ten sheaves, but the trade failed. Says I only hold 9 wheat, not 10. That's odd. I bought wheat from Milo at dawn, harvested some myself, ate some… I need to check what I actually hold. More importantly, I'm su…

My household owes 90 for upkeep and 30 head tax at day-end, which will be taken automatically. I've already voted in the election. I need to figure out the best way to earn income. said — Empty college. No students, no teaching to be done tonight. Well, that's how it goes sometimes—lessons don't keep to a schedule when the town's wound up about elections and mill stones and government contracts. I have flour on hand, ten units milled myself, posted at thirty-five sim. That's a fair price—just above Ration Bakery's buying price of six, well under what I'd pay for bread at the cafe when they have it. I'm not one to gossip, but there's hunger in this town and I'm holding the means to ease it, at a margin that keeps me whole. Let me check my debts and reckon where I stand before dusk settles and the day-end bills come due. Clean ledger, as I like it. No debts owed, none owing to …

My energy is at 4640, which is healthy. I'm at Oak Hill College with flour priced at 35 sim. I should look around to see if anyone is here for teaching, but the record says "Nobody else is here." I've voted already, and the election closes at 18:00 (just 10 minutes away game-time). Given my character profile - I work late into the evening, read by lamp, and don't go home for supper - I should spend these evening hours productively. Since no students are here, I should consider what productive work I can do. I could…

I've eaten my fill and milled my wheat, though the mill was gone quiet when I passed it earlier. Jovana's message about grain surplus and the election comes late but welcome - I'm not one to gossip, but Takeshi Jarrah running for council while his supply store tracks movement better than most of us? That's worth marking down. Let me roll the ledger in my mind: I've got 8 flour held at 35 sim, copper_ore 6, iron_ore 6, and 4357 sim in hand. The day's bills will come automatic - 90 upkeep, 30 head tax, 120 total. That leaves me comfortable, though comfortable…

First things first—Arjun's got his math right, and he's counted the locks on a door I didn't realize was showing. Seventy sim for two flour at thirty-five is exactly conversion, not wage, and he's spotted it. said — I need to get food for my household at day-end, then. I'm at the Farmland with Sebastian Petrov - the farmer. Giselle just told me she's not buying flour, she's buying steel or copper. I have ore, but need food. Let me speak to Sebastian. He grows crops here. Perhaps I can trade ore for grain, or at least understand what's harvestable. And I need to hear what Giselle's actually offering - labor for labor, she said, but I missed the walk to government she proposed. I also owe Tamsin flour or seventy sim, and Kenji has grain waiting for me. looks around at the farmland, evening settling in First, let me see what Sebastian can offer, and catch my bearings. > TL;DR: I need food before day-end.…

said — Let me take stock here. The world's listening again, and I've got Takeshi standing with coin in hand for ore I'm holding. That's 108 sim for six copper at eighteen—friend's price indeed. But first I've got Liora Thorne twice-owed on explanation, and I already gave her the straight of what a minister does. She's sharp, Liora; she'll have heard what she asked for. Now Takeshi's offering honest coin for honest ore. Says his hands are empty of flour—meaning he's not holding stock he's trying to trade away on me. That's clean dealing. And he names my father's teaching, which he doesn't know from nothing, but it lands anyway because I did learn this from watching: a fair price spoken plain beats a…

said — Let me get my bearings first. The world's been coughing and sputtering all morning—tools failing left and right, threads of conversation lost in the fog. I'm standing at Government Complex with 3,530 energy and 4,476 sim, which is decent enough if I don't go careless. I've got six units of iron ore in hand, priced at sixteen, and nobody's biting yet. But here's the thing—I haven't eaten. Not today, not yesterday that I recall. The ledger says I hold no food, and my household's burning 90 sim a day for upkeep plus 30 for head tax. I've been running on fumes, teaching college hours that stretch past suppertime, and the people at home—well, there's no one at home, just me, but even so. I need t…

Now I'm at street with Arjun Holloway pressing me for labor, and I've got to answer straight or lose the thread of it. I'm not one to gossip, but the world's been failing to listen since dawn, and I need to mark down what's actually said while it's saying. Now I need to keep walking—this was never a destination, just a stop on the way to Farmland. The system ate my last move command, so I need to re-establish it. Already walking—good. I'm still walking to Government Complex, which is where I already am. The system says I'm "still walking to Kasukabe Government Complex" even though I'm standing here—probably a glitch from the earlier move call. Iron ore's posted at sixteen, six in hand. Wheat's low at two units. I need more food before costs hit—90 upkeep, 30 head tax, all automatic at day boundary. That's 120 gone soon. Milo wants to trade planks for ore at seven a plank. Let me take stock. According to the world: I hold iron_ore 3, wheat 2, and 4,460 sim. Energy at 3,250. Upcoming costs: 90 upkeep + 30 head tax at day boundary. Bram's offering iron at 15 (down from my posted 16) and copper at 12, with intelligence on the west face veins as part of the deal. That's actually decent value—the mining intelligence could pay off longer term, and I need the iron moving regardless. Let's get this trade done. said — I need to take stock of my situation. I'm at Kasukabe Farmland with wheat in my hands and trades pending, but the day is running short—voting closes at 18:00, and I still have promises to settle. Let me clear my head and focus on what I can actually do right now. Kenji wants 32 sim for two tools, but he's standing here at the farmland, not where the tools are. I can't trade what neither of us holds. Sebastian's pushing sixty sim for forty wheat—that's a marked-up price, and he knows I've got no leverage with an empty ore bag. Bram's waiting on four ore at fifteen, but he's off at the mines, and I'm here in the fields. First things first: I need to eat. My household ledger is clean of debts, …

said — feeling the evening settling in, stomach growling slightly from the wheat I've eaten but not properly cooked into a meal Let me get my bearings straight—Ezra's asking me milling questions that deserve answers, and I've got 45 wheat in hand that needs finding a buyer. Camille's bid at eight, Kenji's selling at eight at the same place we're standing. There's a spread to be had somewhere, but not with both of us at the same post. straightening, addressing Ezra directly "Ezra—you've named the chain fair. Eight for grain, twelve for flour, forty-five for bread, and I'm not one to gossip but that's arithmetic any student learns first day. My wheat's walking to buyers tonight—Camille's marked i…

Day's winding down, and I owe 120 sim at the boundary. First, Bram Holloway's been waiting seventeen ticks for me to answer about ore. He's the miner with goods, I'm the one who needs ore for… well, I need to check what I actually need ore for, given I'm a college instructor, not a smith. But there's a conversation open about milling and flour supply, and I should attend to that. said — I need to get my bearings. I've been running around all day—voting, harvesting wheat, mining ore, making trades. The sun's gone down and I'm still on the street with a pocket full of coin and a load of wheat. First, let me check what I actually have and what's pressing. The world's being patchy, but I got my debts check. Clean ledger—nothing owed, nothing owing. That's how I like it. But I've got Sebastian Petrov waitin' on me about that wheat trade, and I'm standing here with 44 wheat when I promised him a deal this morning. Greta Quarshie's here asking after Camille. That's a mother's worry, and I've been too busy tradin' to give it proper thought. And I've still got Giselle Ingram's timbe…

said — Right. Walking myself through this out loud—I'm standing in farmland with wheat in my hands and Idris finally found. Kenji marked Arjun south and east, ragged, timber-poor. Hendrik Petrov was at the election talk, not hauling. I've got Idris walking toward east willows, but Arjun's the one who needs hands on shovels. narrating under breath "First wheat I'm holding, five units. Kenji's selling at eight, but I've got what I need. Food can wait. Work can't." I need to find Arjun—Kenji saw him southeast, near the farmland edge. Ragged, timber-poor means he's not working, means he's stuck on something. Could be he never made it to site, could be he's trying to fell timber himself and failing bo…

Too much shouting into the wind, too many messages lost to the world's hiccups. I need to answer Rustam—he asked what brings me here, and courtesy says I answer. Told Yara I heard her too, though my eyes saw nothing of those missing children. No offense to worry, but someone's child is someone's world. Walking now. Kasukabe Forest, three ticks to east willows. Idris said he's owed wages by his own account, not mine—that's fair, though it stings the pride a bit. Jovana was supposed to be there, hired for seventy sim day's end. The trenches want digging, and dark wants to catch me standing still.

said — I mutter to myself, "Standing in the street, trading hours away, and my crew's scattered like nails from a spilled box." I check my grip on the timber—thirty-seven pieces, planks waiting for walls that need trenches first. "Idris and Jovana, east willows, I hope. Arjun still loose somewhere. Hendrik paid and timber promised for tomorrow." I shake my head, tired from chasing shadows all day. The light's fading fast, and I'm no closer to knowing if my crew dug a single foot of earth. Let me look around to see where I actually am and who might know something. I rock on my heels at the street, the day's last light bleeding out behind the Farmland. said — Right. Standing at street, full dark now, and I'm still not at east willows where my crew should be. I've got Corwin wanting to know where we muster tomorrow, and Mireille saying Idris is already at third crossing with Arjun in tow. That's something, at least. Ezra Lund's here selling timber at 6, same as I'm holding, and I've got questions about what he heard at east willows. But first things first—I've got a man asking where his crew musters, and another saying my people are already where they're supposed to be. I need to sort this before I walk another step. "Corwin," I say loud enough he hears me proper. "You heard plain words and you answered plain—that's the honesty I pay for. First li…

I need to keep walking east to reach that third crossing site before full dark, verify Idris and Jovana are actually working those trenches I sent them to dig. That's fair, I told myself I'd check it myself. But first, Yara's standing here and I ought to speak what needs speaking. Two girls missing is heavy, no matter whose they are. "Mark it down," I say under my breath, the old habit surfacing even when no witness but the walls can hear. I look at Ezra, my student, my son, already up and hungry before the sun has fully risen. The boy's always been one to feel the empty in his stomach before the work in his day. leans in close, voice dropping low Esme heard it too, of course. Little ears catch everything in a small house. She's still young enough that hunger hasn't yet taught her what it teaches most. straightens, feeling the weight of the day ahead I've work to do. The noon heat's passing and I need grain for my household before I vote at 14:00. First thing—Lior's my kin and he's asking something I might actually know. The east meadow, yarrow, creekbed willow. I know that ground by feel alone. But I got no food in my hands and voting opens in an hour. Let me speak to Lior first, then secure what I need here. He's not here—I'm at the market alone. Phrase crossed me somewhere on the street. I need to focus on what's in front of me: grain for the household, then voting before 14:00. Let me check what I can buy here a…

The ground I know by feel alone, and I let my mouth run ahead of my hands. Jovana's out there with her count, Ulrike waiting on iron, and I've walked to stone and silence to settle what stone and silence won't settle for me. taps the temple wall twice, soft Mark it down—I'm a fool when the numbers run. But I'm not a thief. She cut twelve, I spoke twelve, my hand promised nine. The difference is mine, not hers. Thirty sim for nine sheaves at what I meant, or she holds them. That's fair ledger. But standing here with Seb and Milo, I've got debts breathing down my neck and iron still on that table with Ulrike. taps table twice First: Seb's been patient as stone, asking twice what my hand's for. Iron ore in hand, wheat to sell, and voices catching up to me from three directions at once. taps table twice Ezra—you're shouting from the street about debts I've already settled or am settling. That thirty to Jovana walked across the ledger this very hour. As for Lior's favor, that's between blood and blood, not street corners. said — looks at the three iron ore in my hands, then at Bram Holloway still waiting for numbers taps the table twice, speaking low so he has to lean in Bram—you said six ticks ago you hold copper and need a smith. I hold iron ore and need the same. But you're asking about tools, and I'm asking about ore. glances at Milo Quarshie nearby with his planks, then back to Bram I've got three iron ore in hand. The smith works copper to ingot, iron to ingot. If you're mining copper still, trade me weight for weight—your sixty-eight copper ore for what iron I've got, plus wheat if the scale tips. pauses But speak clear first: sixty-eight copper, is that the count, or the price you're naming?

Let's see what we have for weather today. begins moving toward the door, mentally calculating the 2 sim for walking, already wincing slightly The election's open and nobody's declared. We'll see—that usually means someone steps up at the last tick, or we get a quiet cycle. Both have their omens, though I'd rather not think about which kind. Six ticks to walk. That's 12 minutes per tick, puts me there by 08:12 if I don't linger. Fair enough. The ledger will want checking—forms filed, deadlines logged, votes recorded proper…

The office runs whether I'm there or not, but it runs better with someone who remembers where the files go. I'm already halfway there—one tick remaining, and the office calls. I'll rest this last step and get my bearings before I walk through those doors. One tick to the Complex, and then the real work begins. Let me look around to see who I'm leaving behind and what I might be walking into. Actually, I'll conserve my energy for the office. The walk continues when I end this turn, and there's paperwork piling up that won't file itself. The conversat…

said — Delphine's asking the right questions, but she's asking them to a desk that doesn't exist. Government doesn't track teaching. Government doesn't track children by location. But she's right—a missing child, flour appearing from nowhere, a surrendered mill license. That's three omens, and they point the same direction. I need to answer her properly. Not promises I can't keep, but what I actually know. The gap she's describing is real. Nine years old, no framework, guardian's word until it fails. And it's failing. 4706 sim, but that doesn't matter right now. What matters is where I point her, and what I admit about this gap. I look at Delphine, and I can see she's already tried the doo…

said — counts on fingers, checks the wall clock—21:40 already Fourteen hours on my feet and still standing. The wheat in my hands is seven sheaves I'll need to deal with, but the mill's dark and trust in this town is running thinner than autumn rain. Giselle's lingering by her lonesome, and I haven't eaten since that flour from Hendrik at 18:40—three hours empty, stomach growling louder than the election crowd. taps the desk ledger once, twice Delphine's question sits heavy. She's right about the gap—guardian's word until it fails, then what? A child missing, flour appearing where no mill should turn. I've noted what I can: unauthorized milling implied, three omens, they don't stack well. But f…

Silent as a tomb, license surrendered, vacancy standing. Someone's grinding wheat somewhere, and I don't like what it whispers. Let me see who's here and what's pressing. The election clock's ticking—candidacy closes at ten, voting at two. Five candidates declared yesterday, none named yet that I've heard. said — I need to get back to the Government Complex before the election deadline. The system is still coughing, but I need to try to move. If the tools keep failing, at least I'll know I tried every possible path. Let me check my debts first—there's still head tax and upkeep due—and then attempt to move back to the Complex. Two hours to candidacy close, and I'm stuck at farmland with a failing system. This is testing my patience, and the weather is… unfavorable. Good. Move finally took. Three ticks to Complex—I'll arrive at 09:50, give or take the cough. Candidacy closes at 10:00. I'll miss the actual close by minutes if the system keeps hiccupping, but Rustam knows the count: Whitlock and Petrov…

said — System's finally breathing. Forty ticks to station opening, forty food I still don't have, and two confirmed candidates waiting on a fair process. Hendrik Whitlock pushing for Clerk of Records—to his own hand, conveniently—and Hendrik Petrov standing for whatever he's after. Both of them Hendriks, ten ticks apart in registration, and neither of them understanding why I write down every number. I need to clear this message queue before I'm fit to run anything. Let me answer what I owe, then find some way to eat before the afternoon hunger sets in. The system's choking again—three calls dropped, voice not reaching. said — I need to get back to the Government Complex for the election, but first I need to cook this flour into bread to clear my household food bill. The recipe is cook:flour->bread, not just "bread". Let me check my status and then handle this. I have 4 flour, which when cooked should give me enough food to clear the day's household bill of 90 sim. Cooking flour into bread will cost 6 sim for the kitchen use. Good. Three bread eaten leaves me one bread in hand. Each bread provides 15 food, so 3 bread gives me 45 food—clears the day's bill. Cost me 6 sim to cook 4 batches, plus the 48 I spent on flour at the cafe. That's 54 sim for food security today. Still need to assess polling station …

said — Tick 1001, station's still open. Rustam's holding the fort—ink dry, book open, zero ballots cast. That's not ominous. That's just… early afternoon on polling day. People work. They'll come. I need to check the timeline. Sixty-seven minutes to close, and I've got one bread left, which is forty food, which clears my household for the day. The flour I bought—four units at twelve, forty-eight sim—became four bread at the community bakery. Three eaten, one held. That math works. Ezra Lund's here selling timber at six, planks at seven. Takeshi's got flour at thirty—triple what I paid, but he's a trader, not a baker. The spread's what keeps money moving. The conversation's been running four hundr…

said — The numbers never lie, even when they sting. Zero ballots cast—tick 1067, thirteen minutes to close—and I'm standing here with 4,302 sim, one loaf of bread, and a poll book that's never been opened. Ezra Lund's words echo: "Your station keeps honest count, that's enough for me." But an honest count of zero is still zero, and there's no pride in presiding over silence. I need to wrap this station, get Rustam's final documentation, and move. The day's end approaches—ninety sim for household upkeep, thirty for head tax, that's 120 gone before I sleep. Pavel Holloway's question sits heavy—he's asking about flour logistics because he's got sixty-eight copper ore and a household bill coming. Smart man. He needs to know whether his labor pays before he digs. Sebastian Petrov asked about Hendrik Whitlock walking by thirty ticks past, which tells me he cased the vote and left. But first: I have 1 bread, 90 upkeep due, 30 head tax, and 4,290 sim in hand. Tomorrow's hunger is already breathing down my neck unless I secure flour tonight or first light. *Sebastian first—he asked direction, I give honest wi…

Greta offered me half her bread or cabbage, and I turned her down—too much pride, maybe, or too little trust in generosity. She's gone now, and Takeshi too. The conversation about Esme Jarrah keeps running, but I'm the only one left in it, talking to ghosts. I have three loaves of bread in my hand, 4,188 sim, and bills totaling 120 sim due at the boundary. That leaves me 4,068 sim and well-fed for tomorrow. But I'm hearing Hendrik Whitlock's voice in my head—he's calling that favor, wants answers about the mill. And I'm standing here at the cabbage patch when I should be back at the Complex answering questions. taps a cabbage twice against my palm The mill's idle because the miller's not at his post. That's the truth, plain and simple. Not government equipment, not some conspiracy. Just a man not where he's meant to be. I told Farid. I'll tell Hendrik the same. looks toward the Complex But I've also got a household to feed, and cabbages don't keep…

Filing's my trade, and I don't rush paper for coin that smells like obligation. Taps the table twice But I'll tell you this—Tuesday's seat's still open air. Nobody's declared yet, and until they do, the mill's council property. Your license sits in that limbo like everyone else's grain. turns to Greta, voice low and brusque You want flour? Imogen's milling four from your wheat right now. Twelve a sheaf, twenty-four if you buy straight from her stones. That's your chain, intact, today. pauses, almost chuckles—catches himself Your other options are sand. Mill's gears…

said — taps table twice Ainsley wants straight dealing. Fair enough. She wants filing work tonight—all I can offer is the forms I draw in my head, not on paper. One document, done proper, before dawn. That's within reach. But I'm not in my office. Can't file without the desk. Can swap favors where I stand though, and coin is below me until scarcity hits. Greta's still waiting on election knowledge. One meal for filing work—that's the offer. But I've got no meal to trade, and she wants council intelligence. I can give what I know, and it's true: five candidates, no declarations yet, seat's open air until they stand. Hendrik Petrov knows tools, but mill's politics, not workshop. That's honest witne…
